Dear Class of 2014: We regret to inform you that the nation's job market continues to force college graduates to take jobs they're overqualified for, jobs outside their major, and generally delay their career to the detriment of at least a decade's worth of unearned wages. Good luck on your job search.

...is year's graduates, who are supposed to be starting their ...well go something like that.

Lumina Suggests U.S. Policy Priorities for New Education Environment

Report: "Federal Policy Priorities"

Organization: Lumina Foundation

Summary: To respond to a rapidly changing higher-education environment that includes more low-income students, first-generation students, students of color, and working adults, a range of policies should be adopted on the federal level to raise degree attainment (a particular interest of the Lumina Foundation, the report's sponsor). The report is intended to prompt discussion about how the foundation believes higher education should evolve, and how the federal government can help spur change to increase the number of Americans with high-quality degrees and credentials to 60 percent by the year 2025. The report highlights three suggested federal policy priorities:

- Allowing innovation in higher education to improve outcomes for students, according to the report, would help colleges employ new teaching methods, allow for experimentation to develop new delivery models and credentials, and streamline regulations so that high-performing colleges are rewarded with regulatory flexibility. Where colleges are directly funded by the federal government, evidence of high-quality outcomes for students should also be demanded. This would allow the government to direct federal resources to colleges that demonstrate continuous improvement in student attainment, especially students in underrepresented groups.
- To ensure college affordability, the report recommends restructuring federal student-aid programs so that lower-income students are able to afford college, student costs are more predictable and transparent, and incentives are provided to increase degree completion, reduce price, and limit student borrowing. The report recommends a system that would allow students to apply for, view, and monitor the federal postsecondary-education benefits that they qualify for and that would align minimum standards for eligibility as much as possible.
- Finally, the report recommends that federal higher-education policies ensure the

Senate Bill Asks Colleges to Do More to Combat Sexual Assault

Sen. Claire McCaskill of Missouri (right) and Sen. Kirsten E. Gillibrand of New York, both Democrats, are among the eight cosponsors of the bipartisan measure. They were joined by survivors of campus sexual assault during a news conference about the bill in Washington on Wednesday.

Colleges would have to expand resources for victims of sexual assault and training for employees in handling students' reports of assault under a bill introduced by eight U.S. senators on Wednesday. The proposed legislation seeks to apply pressure through public information and harsher penalties: Annual surveys of students' experiences would be published online, by institution, and colleges found to be out of compliance with federal requirements would face fines of up to 1 percent of their operating budgets.

The bipartisan move—four Democrats and four Republicans sponsored the bill—"bodes well for our shared fight to turn the tide against sexual violence on our campuses," Sen. Claire McCaskill, a Missouri Democrat, said in a written statement. "To curb these crimes, students need to be protected and empowered," she said, "and institutions must provide the highest level of responsiveness in helping hold perpetrators fully accountable."

Under the legislation, colleges would have to designate confidential advisers to support victims and offer them accommodations (such as changes in housing or academic schedules) and information about their
