Western Kentucky University in Owensboro will increase its offerings to 11 majors this fall, adding bachelor’s degrees in social work (BSW) and interdisciplinary early childhood education (IECE).

Other majors already offered include criminology, elementary education, special education/elementary education dual certification, health sciences, interdisciplinary studies, management – business administration, middle grades education, psychology, and sociology.

“We are so excited to bring back these degree options for students throughout this region and give them even more options to prepare for a fulfilling career within their community,” said Dr. Derick B. Strode, campus director. “Social work and early childhood development are two rewarding professional areas with worker shortages. These programs help address that
