Regenerative Farm 101

How can we raise healthy food while protecting the environment? Regenerative agriculture is a system of principles and practices that seeks to rehabilitate and enhance the entire ecosystem of the farm by focusing on soil health. Attention is paid to water management, air quality, carbon capture and sequestration, and biodiversity in every aspect of the farm. It is a method of farming that improves the resources it uses, rather than destroying or depleting them. Spend the afternoon on our farm and see these processes in action.

Story of the Lost Battalion 1918

The United States entered World War I, then called the "Great War," well after it began. Forming a huge army and then transporting it to Europe was a major accomplishment. Our first units fought beside our allies but by September, 1918, the American Expeditionary Army (AEF) could stand apart. In the newspapers back home, two stories gripped the nation that fall, the Alvin York incident, and the harrowing stand of the "Lost Battalion."

The American Way of War in WWII

Historians and theorists tell us that war is simply the continuation of politics (policy) by other means. It follows that each country, given its vastly different geographic, political, economic, social and cultural factors would implement their military policy differently. This two-session seminar will examine six major (and unexpected) examples of the “American Way of War” during World War II where you will find some interesting surprises.

The Great Clashing Worldviews of Karl Marx and John Locke

In this class we will examine the antagonistic worldviews of two world-renowned and consequential thinkers--Karl Marx and John Locke. There is little debate that these are the respective founding thinkers for the communist and liberal democratic systems globally. The Cold War of the twentieth century cannot be understood without knowing their ideas, and their ideas continue to influence the world today. We will discover that the great differences between Marx and Locke on economics and government derive from profoundly different perspectives about the nature of reality--including the nature of humanity.

The Wright Stuff: Getting Airborne with Wilbur and Orville

Wilbur and Orville Wright, two high school dropouts from a small midwestern city, taught the world to fly in the early years of the twentieth century. It is a very American story about two young men and the problem-solving strategies the "Bishop's boys" used to overcome the most intriguing engineering challenge of their time. And yes, there was also a Wright sister--Katherine--and she played an important role as well.

Travel Journal: Camino de Santiago: Walking the Way

The Camino de Santiago replicates the pilgrimage of the Apostle James through Spain on his mission to spread Christianity. Around 900 AD, it was claimed that James' relics had been found in the region of Galicia, resulting in the construction of the Santiago de Compostela cathedral. Although there is both myth and history in this claim, the Camino de Santiago has been a site of pilgrimage for over 1100 years, drawing people from all over the world, people of all faiths and spiritual aims.

Travel Journal: Holiday Season in the City of Joy: Kolkata

Between August and December, there are at least 28 holidays celebrated in Kolkata, India. From Hinduism to Islam to Christianity, it is a lively time of lights and fireworks. Most unusual to westerners is the custom of building Pandals, which are shrines built by neighborhood groups or clubs, ranging from devotion to a deity to commentary on social and political issues. Construction begins in July-August and celebrations follow in late Autumn. Built right in the streets, the Pandals are beautiful works of art that are then demolished, to be rebuilt the next year.
